FOR HEARING
PEOPLE ONLY

I know that the Deaf community includes both "Deaf" and "hard-of-hearing." What other categories are there?

The term "Deaf community" can be broadly applied to include all those in the "hearing-impaired" end of the spectrum. This includes those deaf from birth ("congenitally deaf"), those who become deaf very early in life ("pre-lingually deaf"), those deafened later in life ("adventitiously deaf"), as well as deafened adults. People who suffer from tinnitus, a disorder causing unnatural noises—buzzing, ringing, clicking, roaring—in the ears, should also be included, as tinnitus is a form of hearing impairment.

The Deaf community ideally includes those who are culturally Deaf—native ASL users—as well as those who are deaf but are oriented towards oral means of communication—speechreading and cued speech. Many culturally Deaf people wear hearing aids; some don't.

hospitals, business networks—right down to the totals on supermarket cash registers. That means captioning, interpreters, whether oral or sign-language, better telephone relay services, TTYs, and, equally important, more public awareness. There's still far too little.

People who suffer from tinnitus, a disorder causing unnatural noises—buzzing, ringing, clicking, roaring—in the ears, should also be included, as tinnitus is a form of hearing impairment.

The basic needs of the Deaf community as a whole, whatever "category" each member can be placed in (and categorizing can easily become an exercise in absurdity), are unrestricted communication and unrestricted access to everything Hearing people benefit from and take for granted—TV programming, government offices, public-service agencies,

As long as Deaf people are discriminated against in schooling, employment, social and civil rights, as long as they are seen as "strange" and "different" and "second-class," they will protest, make themselves seen—and heard. All members of the Deaf community, as U.S. citizens, have specific needs, and our democratic society is obligated to ensure that those needs are met.
